Political Reconstruction—The Impend-ing Crisis in Connecticut. From the Herald.

We live in wonderful times. The march of deas is carrying everything before it. It is the momentum of a heavy railway train deacending one of those long sweeps of the Alleghenies, and the cry is "Clear the track!" The patriarch Noah, the builder of the original Great Eastern, the chosen wessel of the Lordold Noah, who lived six hundred years before the flood, who sailed his big ship over the flood, and who survived three hundred and fifty years after the flood-passed, we dare say, through a small experience in the progress of ideas compared with that, for instance, of William Lloyd Garrison or Wendell Phillips-The ancient patriarch, it is true, passed through a great deluge of water, but Garrison and Phillips have passed through a deluge of fire, the most terrible in the world's history, and they still live.

Only look at it. In October, 1835, a female anti-slavery society was riotously broken up in Boston by a collection of conservatives described as "gentlemen of property and standing:" and Mr. Garrison, who went to the meeting to deliver an address, after attempting to conceal himself in a carpenter's shop from the fury of the mob, was captured, had his clothes torn off, and was dragged through the streets with a rope around his neck. And for what? For preaching in Boston negro emancipation. Cotton then was king, even among the Puritans. Still later in the day, in New York, the famous Democratic Empire Club annually set apart a contingent fund for the reception of the abolitionist Phillips with a welcome of rotten eggs. Now, mark the change. Garrison is hailed as a public benefactor everywhere. He has had a jubilee in Charleston. He is the object of a fifty thousand dollar subscription fund; and as for Phillips, if he now becomes comparatively tame in his philippics, it is because he misses the inspiration of Captain Rynders and his shower of eggs. Are not these among the wonders wrought in Israel

Who can tell what next is coming? With the country turned upside down and inside out, there is no telling what may come to the surface. In the work of political reconstruction the materials at hand must be used. Thus our hard-set Democracy in our last November election were compelled to take a new departure. At Chicago they were headed by the banker Belmont and his coach and six: two years later, in New York, the ex-pounder of Yankee Sullivan, the banker Morrissey (faro and keno), is called to the rescue. He pays his way and goes into Congress, but his friend Hoffman, of the old Democratic pattern, is left in the lurch. He was not sufficiently reconstructed, like Morrissey, to win. He was, in fact, behind the drift of events and the spirit of the age. He was still running the old cart of the Dred Scott decision against the steam engine of emancipation, and so Hoffman was capsized, while Morrissey is hailed as the new Democratic champion for the belt in Congress against the mighty Ben Butler.

Profiting from this example of a new experi-

ment to meet the new order of things, the radicals of Connecticut have struck upon a still bolder adventure. They have made the irrepressible P. T. Barnum, the living embodiment of Yankee notions, their champion and their new platform, against William H. Barnum, an old fogy, famous only for those oldfashioned virtues of times gone by and for his well-earned success in the iron business. But he and all the other Barnums must give way to The Barnum, as all the O'Donoghues stand back in the presence of The O'Donoghue. And what are Garrison and Phillips compared with this Barnum? Men of one idea against a man of ten thousand ideas. Take, for example, twenty-five years of the career of Phillips and twenty-five of The Barnum, and mark the contrast. Phillips begins, with some silver and gold in his possession, to preach emancipation; Barnum begins his negotiations for the old American Museum with nothing but brass; Phillips continues, year after year, out of pocket, harping, like Paganini, on one string; Barnum plays on a harp of a thousand strings, and a thousand different tunes, all in the same key. Yet he, too, has had all along one grand idea. Old style people might call it the idea of obtaining money on false pretenses; but it is more than that. It was the poet's idea of a mermaid painted on canvas outside the museum and the dried-up head and arms of a monkey deftly joined to the tail of a codfish inside the museum; it was a dray load of old bones transformed into a Greenland whale; it was a woolly horse from an ash-cart changed into a ferocious nondescript captured by Colonel Fremont on the Gila river after three days' chase with a squad of dragoons; it was in the day when Santa Anna was a mighty hero, the transformation of an article, bought perhaps next door, into Santa Anua's wooden leg; it was in the person of a leprous African, the living embodiment of the negro turning white, a point of philanthropy in behalf of Sambo which Phillips and Garrison have never tried to reach.

Nor does the record of The Barnum stop here. Sir Philip Jones says that men consti-tute a State. They are certainly the strength of a State. In this view, while Barnum has sought the improvement of the various breeds of dogs and chickens in his dog shows and chicken shows, he has also sought the improvement of man, and the white man, in his baby shows, and has, perhaps, "done the State some service" in his premiums for the lady honoring her delighted spouse with the product at one birth of the best four, the best three, or the best two babies in the market. What a contrast in this encouragement of population is thus presented by Barnum against the original ruling idea of John Morrissey of pounding the life out of men for a premium!

Against this Barnum and the progressive radicals, what chance has the other Barnum in Connecticut? None, The other Barnum is behind the age. The Hon. Ben. Wood himself would stand no chance against the Barnum who commenced the lottery business "on his own hook" at sixteen years of age. Behold also the ground which his platform covers in the making of the most hideous monsters and impostures subjects of public gratification; in proving by practice how the most belligerent varieties of creatures may be made "a happy family;" in producing a living example of the negro turning white; and in improving "the white man's government" by premiums on those rejoicing mothers blest with the most bountiful supply of babies, Against this comprehensive platform of the one Barnum the other Barnum can only show citizen. His chances in the field of politics are gone by. Reconstruction is the order of the and modern progress, such as Garrison and Phillips, Hen Butler and old Thad. Stevens, John Morrissey and P. T. Barnum, lead the way. Andy Johnson is nowhere, Greeley is befogged, and Thurlow Weed, with his bogus dead body of Morgan, is laid on the shelf.

The impending crisis in Connecticut is be tween the two Barnums, and as the issue is whether this great revolution of modern ideas shall go on or be stopped, the progressive Barnum is our ticket. Keep the ball rolling.

British Dining. From the Tribune.

Somebody said, long ago, that no association of Englishmen could get itself fairly into working harness without a preliminary dinner at some London or other tavern. The benevolently disposed of a religious turn are usually content with a breakfast, and viands manageable with the fork; but the political Bull must be fed upon something more substantial, and sustained at least by the national beef and pudding. Our latest advices from England disclose, as one result of public perturbation, an unusual amount of gregarious feeding. The Adullamites have entertained Mr. Horsman at Stroud, and Mr. Powel at Leeds. The people of Portsmouth have given Lord Monek a dinner, and there have been other great convivialities, to say nothing of the religious banquets which the churchwardens are always engaged in celebrating in all parts of the empire.

It is impossible for outside barbarians like ourselves to get at more than the meanest part of these trencher-events, i. c., the speeches, which usually savor of indigestion, fine old port, and incipient apoplexy. We do not know why these brilliant and bold feeders cannot enjoy their excellent cuts, their turtle, and their tipple, without assaulting the United States; but beef being the diet of a soldier (when he can get it), we suppose that a plenty of it incites to pugnacity. Horsman, for in stance. Horsman sneeringly told his hearers that the Adullamities did not intend to go to America for their political principles. As nobody has asked or has expected them to do so, it seems to us that this disavowal is somewhat gratuitous; and while Mr. H. was making such a liberal display of his religion, and getting rosy of countenance while he defended the Church, he might have remembered that charity is popularly supposed to occupy no unimportant place in the Christian scheme.

We may, as Mr. Horsman said, "envy the British their Constitution;" but as we cannot get it, and as our weakness is amiable, we think it hardly kind to upbraid us with it. To add to our mortification, Mr. Powel, M. P., at Leeds, sang the same sarcastic tune, and made the most of the talk of impeaching Mr. Johnson-of expelling from office "a President elected by the voice of the people"—which shows that the ideas of Mr. Powel are somewhat misty. Beecroft, M. P., who came after him, quoted Scripture in defense of Conservatism as follows:--"That good thing which was committed unto thee, keep !" A fine text, applicable to tithes, to pensions, and to poor Ireland-that last "good thing" which it costs more to "keep" than it would to throw away. But a Mr. McDougal, at the Monek dinner, let the largest, and altogether the most extraordinary, eat out of the bag. McDougal (of the Canadian Cabinet) has associated much (he says) with Mr. Seward; and he intimates that the Secretary is a great admirer of the House of Lords and of the House of Commons. This probably comes of Mr. Seward's extraordinary politeness. Desiring to do the agreeable to a member of the Canadian Cabinet, and probably under genial and deipnosophistical influences, Mr. Seward said something to his guest about the sublime beauties of the British Parliament, which that guest carries back to England as an argument against Parliamentary Reform. For we don't suppose that, ill as he thinks of the present Congress, and little reason as he has for loving Mr. Seward is really in favor of rotten boroughs and general popular disfranchisement. Nor was Mr. Lincoln, who was quoted as expressing a similar opinion. The flower of this rhetorical crowd to which we have alluded was undoubtedly Mr. Horsman. If the England of to-day, full of pain and anxiety, and sorely troubled about the future, can be saved by oratorical commonplaces and by threadbare phrases, Horsman the predestinate savior of the empire. He is the man to talk about the "purer and the higher principles;" about the maxims of the religion which is "our hope;" about "our noble Constitution, which is the bulwark of freedom;" also, "the type of progress;" also "the envy and admiration of the world." We wonder how long loose, and flabby, and conventional, and traditional talk like this can make even a respectable stand against Mr. John Bright's eloquence and common sense When we say not long, we do not speak without experience. We have tried that medicine for political ills upon this side to our exceeding sorrow and expense. Neither dinners nor speeches after them, neither beef nor sophistry, neither venison or platitudes, neither turtle nor sneers at the United States, neither port wine nor pathetic praises of the past, can do more than Iull the England of to-day into a slumberous confidence which will be fatal to the England of to-morrow. Indeed, the time even for doing so much seems to have gone by. The beef at the tavern dinners may be potent, but the want of it in the poor man's pot will prove more potent still. At any rate, the difficulty will hardly be tided over by the exertions of men born four hundred years too late, and who spend the time and wind which belong to their own country in blowing up the Americans.

The Late Mission to San Domingo.

From the Times. Private advices which we have just received from San Domingo lead us to believe that the late Seward-Porter mission to the West Indies was by no means such a failure as it was hastily proclaimed to be by those who knew nothing whatever about it. In fact, no one need be surprised if we should speedily earn that it was a success in all its parts, and that the scheme was not one hastily and crudely formed, but was the same scheme which had long attracted the attention of our Government, and which the Secretary of State himself put in the way of consummation during his visit to the West Indies a year or more ago. When Assistant Secretary Seward left Annapolis with Admiral Porter on a Government vessel, in January last, he was rightly reported as accredited on a mission to enter into nego-tiations with the authorities of San Domingo for securing or purchasing a harbor and por in that island as a naval station of the United States. The fine, valuable, well-known, and long-desired Bay of Samana was the locality whose acquisition was to be effected, and it a first-rate quality of iron, a good income, and a good character as a man of business and as a the Dominean Government at this time in was to be done through the actual assent of mer-hand, and so puny as has great even I

Seward was successfully accomplished; the points of negotiation and treaty were established with President Cabral; and within the present week au official agent has arrived in this country bearing a preliminary treaty which has received the sanction of the legislative and executive authorities of San Domingo, and this preliminary treaty will presently be submitted, if it has not by this time been submitted, to our Government.

This matter is one of very high importance to the United States-important in referense to our commercial interests, and to our present and future position as a great and self-defensive power. We trust that no obstacle will impede the consummation and ratification of the treaty, and our acquisition of this West Indian

The Supreme Court-Its Relations to the Pending Conflict. From the World.

We suppose it to be good generalship at every new movement of the enemy to reconnoitre his strength, with a view to discover the most effective disposition which can be made of our own.

The strength of the conservative position for immediate operations lies in the President and the Supreme Court. But these advantages are defensive and temporary. They are of little use except as a means of gaining time to rally and recruit our forces. Unless we can elect President Johnson's successor, his fidelity to the Constitution is but a transient advantage. So long as there was reason to hope for the final closing up of this controversy during his term, it was not necessary to look to the Presidential election as the key of the political situation. But, since the recent action of Congress cuts off expectation of relief previous to that event, it is necessary to extend the scope of our calculations.

We must estimate the possibilities that lie beyond the Presidential election, in order to act intelligently in the preliminaries of the election itself. If any portion of the conservatives, North or South, think that we shall be as well off without the next President as with, they will, of course, oppose any tactics to improve our chances of electing him. For our part, we do not wish to see this point decided without discussion, but after discussion; and if, on a fair comparison and balance of advantages, the South think it best to let the Presidential election go by default, it is not for us to question their right of abstention.

In the actual position of affairs, the Supreme Court is of no more value to the South than the President. In the absence of the South from Congress, the adverse majority being sufficient to overrule the President's veto; h is practically powerless, except to stand as sentinel at the door of the Supreme Court. A two-thirds majority of Congress avails nothing against a decision of the Court; and the appointment of the Judges being vested in the President, Congress can accomplish nothing by increasing their number. But if the Republicans elect President Johnson's successor. they will thereby gain control of the Supreme Court, and thus remove the only barrier that stands between their absolute will and the unprotected South. If the conservatives do not carry the next Presidential election, the South s delivered over to six years more (six counting from this date) of unrelieved oppression. A radical President could veto every bill repealing the acts of this and the succeeding ongress, and whatever revolutions might take place in popular sentiment during the four years ending March 4, 1873, the long term of the Senators will prevent our getting twothirds of the Senate, and passing repeal laws over the veto. There is, accordingly, no visible hope of early justice to the South, except through the Presidential election. Meanwhile, conservative majority of the Court is a valuable temporary advantage

But this advantage is too limited, and is held by too frail a tenure, to be an important element in any long-sighted political calculation. The tenure of the Judges is, to be sure, stable in one respect, since they keep their offices during good behavior. But the conservative advantage in that Court is held by the slender thread of a single life. There are five conservative and four radical Judges; the eldest men, appointees of former Democratic Presidents, being among the conservatives, and, in the usual course of nature, most likely to die. The loss of one conservative Judge would make a tie, and no law can be declared unconstitutional but by a clear majority. President Johnson could not replace a conservative Judge by a new appointment, because Congress, at its last session, passed a law reducing the number of Judges to seven, forbidding any new appointments until, by the occurrence of vacancies, that limit is reached. ... The consequence is, that if a case testing the constitutionality of the Sherman law should be made up by the South during the coming season, it would depend upon the life of every one of five men, some of them far advanced whether the decision, a year hence, would be favorable. The chance is certainly worth the trial; but is subject to this contingency. Whatever may be the immediate prospect of life, it would be against the ordinary course of nature for the conservative majority to remain till the close of a new Presidential term, or even far into it. The Supreme Court is, at best, but a temporary dyke to help stay the floods while we are building a more permanent embankment. If we do not earry the Presidential election, the Supreme Court will at once cease to afford any protection. In the meantime, the death of one venerable old man may, any day in the year, take away all its restraining power. Practically, the question is no longer what may be done this side of the Presidential election, but what may be done by means of it. Under the most favorable circumstances, a de cision of the Supreme Court cannot be obtained before next winter; and by that time we are on the very eve of the Presidential election. If the Supreme Court, in setting aside the new law, could also restore the Southern States to Copgress, or insure the counting of their electoral votes, a decision next winter would be in ample season. But the sole effect of their decision would be to remand things back to the condition in which Sherman's bill found them. The admission or exclusion of members is a business over which the Supreme Court has no jurisdiction or control. The electoral votes will be counted in the presence of both Houses and under their superintendence, and when the result is declared by the President of the Senate, there is no tribunal that can review it. If the new law should be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, next winter Congress would pass a new act, prescribing other terms of restoration; and as the compliance of the Southern States with the new conditions could not be submitted for approval until the following session, the South would be excluded from the Presidential election, without remedy or re-

This is the chief result at which the radicals aim. They would as willingly see it accomplished by an adverse decision of the Supreme power. Now (if our advices from the island be correct) the mission of Assistant Secretary Court as by Southern non-acceptance of a plan feating Southern participation in the election establishes their demination for six years from the 4th of March now at hand. It is all one to them whether the new law is set aside or sustained. A decision either way, is equally favorable to their wishes, provided the South does not meanwhile reorganize under the new law. If the South waits to test it and get a decision on it, the Southern States are excluded from the Presidential election any way. If, by the death of a conservative judge, the law should be sustained, and the South should then acquiesce, it would be too late to take part in the Presidential election, since the new constitutions could not be presented for approval until the winter following.

Sherman's bill varies the situation, by an unequivocal Congressional pledge that the States shall be restored on their compliance with certain clearly defined conditions. No such pledge was made in connection with the Constitutional amendment passed at the last session. The Southern States might have ratified that, and yet Congress might have excluded them without violating any explicit promise. Both schemes were artfully trived for staving off restoration as their main object, and charging the blame of postpone ment upon the South as their minor object. It is the policy of the Republicans to block the wheels while making a bustling pretense of trying to move them. By a shrewd calculation, based upon a pretty correct knowledge of Southern opinion, they succeeded last year; and by a calculation equally shrewd they are in a fair way to succeed again. By rejecting the amendment last year, the South risked nothing. But the approach of the Presidential election makes time so important an element, that a delay of a single year will cost the conservative cause all the Southern electoral votes.

True it is that no lapse of time can change the question of constitutional right; but rights avail nothing without remedies, and if no remedy comes through the next Presidential election, from what quarter does the South look for one? Is the conservative cause so superfluously strong that it can afford to throw away sixty or seventy electoral votes ? Time and events have brought things to such a pass that if those votes are worth saving, they must be saved by Southern action this year. Far be it from us to dogmatize or dictate; the South is just as free to refrain from action as it is to act. But "there is a tide in the affairs of men:" and it is for the South to judge for itself whether there is a prospect of compen-sating advantages, sufficient to justify it in withholding its assistance in the Presidential
